Commentary

In April, the changes in our view were two: first, the market stance towards future FED and ECB rate cuts, as the macroeconomic data reflected higher inflation in the US, with a healthy jobs market and an economy that continues to grow despite the cost of financing. The number of expected cuts of 0.25, from the street to the Fed fund rates, passed from 7 in December, to 3 at the end of March '24 to 1 at the end of April '24, in H2'24e. In light of the expectations of the rate, the markets rallied from October '23 by 15-20% to reflect the impact of risk-free DCF valuation with a consequent multiple expansion that we find difficult to justify at this stage. The ECB, given the lack of growth and lower inflation transpired from data so far, seems keen to start to cut rates in June. The BOE is also on the same page.

During the FY'23 reporting season, most of the companies were projecting a difficult H1'24 due to comparison to H1'23 and a better H2'24 thanks to easier comps, lower financing costs, higher real wages, and the return of consumer confidence; forecasting, therefore, a potential mid-single-digit growth by year-end in top line and a 2-3% EPS growth. Second, looking at the universe of companies that we follow, so far, the order intake for industrials in Q1'24 in many cases has been lower than in Q4'23, consumer spending remains subdued with a postponement of spending in large tickets like automotive in the US like in Europe. We see the GDP data recently reported in the US 1.6% y.o.y. for Q1'24, it is positively affected by government spending just like in the EU 0.5% y.o.y. we do not expect a rebound in demand in H2'24 at this stage and we start to see a weaker labor market with the activation of redundancy funds in Europe.

It is our conviction that current valuations can't be supported by current EPS growth expectations and the lack of reference rate cuts, as such, we continue to maintain a conservative stance and see the risk of a market correction over the coming months given the valuation gap. We have position since last winter the Eagle fund for a higher for longer rates scenario, with a recession in EU following our company meetings in Germany. We start to see opportunities in the mid-small cap universe once it is assessed the "new normal" market demand, post-pandemic, post-supply, and demand shocks.
